Valparaiso,

progressive views displayed by some of the elected members of that body are illustrations of improvement, while the recent reported utterances of Lord Knutsford, that he was unwilling to impose upon Crown colonies legislation to which those colonies were opposed, is certainly a beginning of something as pleasing as it was unexpected. With these indications, gentlemen, I consider that in the future, and in the near future we shall have the representation of the colonies in the Chamber that governs this colony. This present method, by which official members are compelled to vote as they are directed, whether their opinions are in accord with these instructions that are given to them or not, I think is not worthy of the present age (Hear, hear and applause.) Gentlemen, I hope that even if freedom be given to the official members to vote as they are directed, the dictates of their own consciences will not be the ultimate limit of our progress. I trust and I hope that in the future we shall have this morally as a stepping stone, and that the whole of this Colony will be represented in its Chamber of Council by the elected members of this Colony (Applause.) Fancy, gentlemen, our ordinary everyday work, not merely the Imperial policy of this colony being governed by, subordinated to, and under the control of people ten thousand miles away. What would we think of our own business affairs, many of which are, I venture to say, of greater magnitude than the affairs of this Colony—if these business were left in their everyday policy under the control of a department at Home. (Hear, hear.) It appears to me that this control of the Home Government is as absurd as it is mischievous; for what can they know of our everyday life—how can they follow it? They can't do it at all, even though they may have permanent officials at Home who may at some period in their lives have spent some years in this colony, they cannot keep themselves in touch with what is continually passing amongst us, because only a man who is resident here can keep in touch with the requirements of the colony. (Hear, hear.) In making these remarks I would deprecate that they should be twisted or turned in any way as to reflect on any member of Council either past or present, or upon the collective governments that have preceded us. My remarks refer not to individuals but to the system. I trust that the candidate who will be elected at this meeting will bear in mind what our end is—that it is progress in the direction which will enable this colony to obtain as far as possible representation against taxation. We will now, gentlemen, proceed in the usual way to elect a member of Council for the Chamber of Commerce. Gentlemen who have candidates to propose will nominate them, and we shall then proceed to ballot, and the declaration of the poll will be made in the usual way.

Mr. P. Ryrie—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have much pleasure in rising to propose as a fit and proper person to represent us in the Council a gentleman well known to us all. He has been well and favourably known now for eight years in the colony, and I am quite sure you all know him to be a gentleman of such intelligence that he will see very soon his position and take his own line in the Council of which I have been a member myself for twenty-three years. He is eminently suited for the position, and as far as officials are concerned, I don't think that he will know to any of them, and if he thinks a thing is right I don't think it will matter whether it is done in his name or against him. (Applause.) He is eminently competent I think to represent the unofficial element in the Council. I don't think I have anything more to say, gentlemen, and I will ask the Chairman if he will kindly second the nomination of the gentleman I propose.

Hearing resumed his seat and said—What's his name?—What's his name?—I don't know him. (Applause.)
